From Oxen to Paper Money

1 In Europe and Asia the first “medium of exchange” or standard of value” was not gold or silver, but oxen. In other parts of the world, however, such different things as salt, stones and shells were all used as ‘money’. They all offered advantages over the direct exchange of goods, but none of them was perfect. Some were too heavy, some could not be divided into small enough parts (how much of a cow would you need to buy a piece of bread?), some did not last long enough. The solution was money as we know it, that is, as coins.

2 The invention of coins appears to have happened at almost the same time but quite independently in Greece and China in about 700 BC. Experts believe development was independent because of important differences in two systems.

3 In Greece, a natural alloy of gold and silver called ‘electrum’ was found in large pieces in rivers. The first coins were taken out of these pieces with a tool called a punch. In order to distinguish these coins from other pieces of gold, a design, or ‘type’, to use the technical expression, was added on one side. At first, these types were very simple: flowers or squares. Meanwhile, in another part of Greece, circular silver coins were made, and these quickly became more common everywhere in Greece than electrum ones. Soon, words appeared, the first known one being “I am the sign of Phanes” from Halicarnassus around 600 BC. About 200 years later, the first pictures of rulers appeared on coins.

4 The first money to appear in China was very different since it was made of an alloy of copper and tin. In particular, it was not circular, but in the shape of a knife! The knife had a hole in the handle so that it could be hung, and, like some Greek coins, it generally bore writing. Other shapes include keys or spades, but what they had in common was the hole. It was probably around 250 BC that the first Chinese money we would recognize as coins appeared and later, the famous Ming factory produced a round coin with a square hole in it. This particular coin bore the words, ‘knife of Ming’, but the knife itself had disappeared. It was from this coin that smaller units of currency developed. Although Chinese coins often had writing, they almost never had pictures or types of any kind until the nineteenth century when they were influenced by western models.

5 As for paper money, that was a Chinese invention, too. In the thirteenth century AD Marco Polo brought stories of such money to Europe, but the idea didn’t inspire the Europeans of his time. In fact, first examples of modern paper money were the billets printed in France in 1716 by a Scottish businessman, John Law. A common English word for money (cash) comes from
